Suffixed to the root-word of any Turkish verb and preceded by a formative esere vowel, the letter ش forms a noun of manner which is sometimes taken as a simple noun of action; as, باقى (look thou), باشى (a manner or kind of look or looking).

Suffixed to the root-word of any primitive affirmative verb, and preceded by the formative esere vowel when the root ends with a quiescent consonant, the letter ش is used to form a new verb-root that commonly implies reciprocal action. But sometimes this form is used when the actor is but one, and then each part of that actor is conceived as a concurrent actor throughout the parts and the whole. Thus: باقى (to look), باشقى (to look at one another, or, to look concurrently at something); سويلدىك (to speak), سويلدىكك (to speak together or with one another). Sometimes, again, this form of the verb expresses an action that is repeated or continued and distributed by one actor, or by several actors, over the parts of the object: thus: آراقى (to seek for), آراقىش (to seek a thing in many places, to examine every place for it).

In Persian the letter ش is used to form a noun of action, of which certain ones are used in Turkish literature; as, آفرينش (creation), سوزش (a burning), etc.

In the dates of letters and documents the letter ش, deprived of its dots, represents the month of شعبان

A. ص sâd. The seventeenth letter of the Turkish and Persian, and fourteenth of the Arabic alphabet. Its full name is ص The undotted; it is also ص The of the word ص (in the اجد formula). Its phonetic value is that of s in sorrow.

Being one of the hard consonants, it is always pronounced with one of the hard vowels when movent, and it affects even the preceding vowel in a word, making it hard when it would, otherwise, have been soft.

The letter س is reduplicated in pronunciation, when it immediately follows the Arabic definite article ال.

When followed by ح, or ه, care should be taken to avoid combining the pronunciation of the two letters into the sound of the English sh. Each should have its full value, thus, سحاب sāḥab, تسحیح tāshih.

The numerical value of س is 90.

Many Turkish words now written with س are found in some authors written with س. Hence Turkish words found written with س may occur in this Lexicon written with س.

When an Arabic trilateral root begins with س and passes to the eighth form (افعال), the servile ث of the form is changed into ط; thus اصطلاح, اصطلاح, etc.

In dates of letters and documents it stands for the month سفر. سورة س. The chapter of the letter س, the thirty-eighth chapter of the Qur'an.

ا. ض āḏa. The eighteenth letter of the Turkish and Persian alphabets, and fifteenth of the Arabic. Its phonetic value is, without any possible rule for the difference in Turkish, either a hard modification of the letter z, or a hard modification of the letter d. Students will pronounce it as an ordinary z or d. It is a hard consonant, and always followed by a hard vowel when movant. Its full name is ضاد مجعہ, the dotted ض. It is also designated as ضاد ضبط, the ض of the word ضبط in the الحمد formula. Its numerical value is 800. It is one of the letters reduplicated in pronunciation instead of the ل of the Arabic definite article ال, when it follows this article as the initial of the noun.

It has no grammatical use in Turkish. In Arabic derivation, in the eighth form, when ض is the initial radical of a trilateral root, the servile letter ت is changed into ط; thus; ضجع, ضطجع, اضطجع etc.

1. ط ṭā. vulg. ṭī. The nineteenth letter of the Turkish and Persian alphabets, and sixteenth of the Arabic. Its phonetic value in Arabic words and Persian compounds of them, and in some Turkish words, is that of a hard t. In other Turkish words it has the value of a hard d, but always has the value of t when found at the end of a word; also whenever it is followed by an eserō vowel it has the value of t. In words of foreign origin, ط is often used instead of ث. Europeans sometimes represent the ط by the combination th; but there is no valid reason for this.

The numerical value of this letter is 9. It is reduplicated in pronunciation when it follows the Arabic definite article al, as: كتاب الحلاق kitāb al-ḥalāq.

In Arabic derivation, when the ط is the initial radical of a word, the servile ت of the eighth form is changed into ط, and the two letters ط thus resulting are combined into one, reduplicated in pronunciation; as; طلع ṭaṭalla; طراد ṭaṭarad; طرد ṭaṭard; طمر ṭaṭmar.

A. ظ zā, vulg. zī. The twentieth letter of the Turkish and Persian alphabets, and seventeenth of the Arabic. Its phonetic value is, according to Turk- ish pronunciation, that of a hard z. The full name of the letter is ظا (the dotted ظ) and ظظ (the ظ of the word ظظ, in the ebjed formula)

The ظ is one of the letters reduplicated

in pronunciation instead of the j of the Arabic definite article ال, when it follows this article as the initial letter of a noun.

In Arabic derivation, the occurrence of ظ as the first radical of a triliteral root, such as ظلم, necessitates a modi- fication of the servile ت of the eighth form (افعال), which must then be changed into ط or ظ; if the servile ت be changed into ظ, this latter combines with the first radical ظ as a reduplicated letter; thus, instead of اظلام izilūm, we have اظلام izzilūm, for اظلام; but if ط be used instead of the servile ت, we may either use the word اظلام izilūm, or convert the radical ظ into ا ط, and combine the two into one reduplicated ظط; as, اظلام izzilūm. This last is of a less frequent occurrence.

ع

أ. ع ayn, Twenty-first letter of the Turkish and Persian alphabets, and eighteenth of the Arabic. It does not enter into the orthography of any purely Persian or Turkish word. Its phonetic value in Arabic and in an Arab mouth, is a harsh guttural catch or hiatus. As pronounced by a Turkish scholar, the letter is either entirely silent, or the slightest hiatus is made sensible. But, though often silenced by the educated, and unknown to the vulgar, the letter ع has a solid consonantal value. It may be considered as the harsh hiatus; and, as such, may be paired off with the soft hiatus, (the hemze). In other words, ع may be considered a hard hemze. The place of an ع in a word, should always be marked in transliteration.

In this work we have adopted a reversed apostrophe (thus: ') to represent the ع in transliterations, distinguishing it from the sign which represents the hemze, by turning its head in the opposite direction.

As a harsh consonant, the ع should be always followed, when movent, by a hard vowel, but, as it is itself softened down in Turkish pronunciation, ا, إ, and ؤ are occasionally used after it.

This letter has the numerical value of 70 in chronograms.

The full name of the letter is عين (the letter ع of the word sa'is in the chjed formula), and عين ممتلئة (the undotted ع).

In astronomical works the letter is used as an abbreviation for اجتماع (conjunction), and for ربع (quadrature). In the margin of the Qur'an, it denotes the end of a section of ten verses, and before a quotation of poetry, it marks a hemistich (مصرع).

ع

أ. ع ‘ayn. The twenty-second letter of the Turkish and Persian alphabets the nineteenth of the Arabic. It has the numerical value of 1,000 in chronograms. Its phonetic value in Turkish is that of a guttural spirant, something like that of the French r grassié, but at the beginning of Arabic and Persian words its value as pronounced by Arabs, is often that of hard q. In Turkish words when it is not initial, it is generally softened down, even to the point of being inaudible. We have represented the softened sound of غ, as well as its guttural sound in this lexicon, by the English combination gh; and this must be sometimes softened in pronunciation. Thus; اُغ āghā (almost ā-ā), اُج āghāj (almost ā-j), يَغْمُ yāgh-māq (not at all like yālmāq, the غ being here much more sensible, though not approaching to yāghmāq). After a vowel و with the sound of o or u, the غ has very much the sound of w; like gh in throughout. Thus صَوغَ is pronounced ṣo-vān. From these remarks it will be seen that this letter is one of the peculiarities and niceties of the Turkish language, and calls for attentive study.

A Turkish grammatical function of the letter غ is to replace a final ق, when followed by a vowel, by the addition of a postposition or possessive pronoun. Thus; طوباق ṭuḃāq, a lip; طوباقك ṭuḃāq^hin (almost ṭuḃāq^h-in), of a lip, etc. So in some of the parts of verbs in مق; as, قيردق qirdiq, قيرديم qirdighim, باقى bāqma^q; باقتە bāqma^h-ghā. In a few monosyllabic Turkish words the final ق resists this grammatical degradation; as, آق āq, آقك āq^h-qin, etc., but چوق chōq, makes چوغك chōghūn (almost chōwūn), etc.

A. ك kyāf. kōf. The twenty-fifth letter of the Turkish and Persian alphabets and twenty-second of the Arabic. In Turkish this letter has seven different phonetic values; namely, (1) that of the English k. as كر kōr. كوت kisvōt. etc., (2) that of hard g (unknown in Arabic); as كرم gōrm. كل gūl. etc., (3) and (4) those of ky and gy (hard g), special to Turkish pronunciation when the kef is followed by a long vowel ا ā, by a long و ō, or by a short vowel ا ā, ō; as كات kyātū. كور kyūr. كوب kyūb. كور gyūr. كير gyūr. etc., (5) that of y (special to Turkish words, as a final or medial in a word); as كاك ōymōk. كاك ōy, etc., (6) that of ng (also special in Turkish words), generally softened into a simple n. or in the word كوك sōnā. sometimes omitted altogether, sōnā, and (7) that of w, when following a vowel ا ā or ō; as كوكه gyūwōrtā. كوكه gyūwōrtā; etc. Our method of transliteration for these different values, as shown above, is k. g. ky. gy. y. n. w. In its Arabic value, this letter is the original of the European k, as ق is the true source of the European q.

When a ك, with its Arabic value, is final in a Turkish Ottoman word that has to be modified by a possessive pronoun or a preposition preceded by a vowel sound, the ك undergoes no modification in writing, but its phonetic power changes from k to y; as كوكه kyūpōk. كوكه kyūpōyim. كوكه kyūpōyā. etc. If it, in such cases, be followed by a consonant, it suffers no change of phonetic value; as كوكه كوكه kyūpōklōr. كوكه كوكه kyūpōklōr. etc. Us-čár (čarān), wár (wārān), māchīn (māč), ī (qīrān), rūdā (rūdān). — ā nasal.

ed with its other phonetic values, the final ک undergoes no change in such cases; as, م سگ. سگ sēgim. م سگ. etc.

The ک has several Turkish and one Persian grammatical use.

1. As nasal n, it marks the genitive definite.

2. Alone, it is the possessive adjective pronoun of the second person singular, and is suffixed to the noun possessed of a vowel. بک bābān, etc.

3. Alone, final, and quiescent, it forms the second person singular of all the past tenses of the conjugation of verbs, اوردك oqudūn, يزدك yūzūn.

4. Joined to the root of the verb, with or without the addition of ز it forms the second person plural of the imperative; as, بآ بآ. بآق bāq. بآق bāqim or بآق bāqimis.

As a Persian letter, the Arabic ک forms the diminutive of nouns, and requires their final quiescent consonant to become movent with ustun; as, مرد mōrd, مردك mōrdēk; مردم mōrdūm, مردمك mōrdūmōk.

The ک has the numerical value of 20, in chronograms and in mathematical works.

The original name of the letter is کاف káf, vulg. kōr, but, to distinguish between the k and g powers of the letter in Persian and Turkish words, it is called کاف عربī káf arabi, or کاف تازی káf tāzi, when it has the former, and کاف فارسی káf fārsi, or کاف عجمī káf ʿajmī, when it takes the latter value. It is also called صاعر کاف sāghir kōr, (surd ک), and even صاعر نون sāghir nūn, (surd ن), when it becomes nasal, or is pronounced as a simple n.

A. J ^{11am} The twenty-sixth letter of the Turkish and Persian alphabets, twenty-third of the Arabic. Its phonetic value is that of l. It has the numerical value of 30 in chronograms and mathematical formulæ. It represents the lunar month Shewwal in the dates of documents.

In Turkish grammar, quiescent itself, and preceded by an esere vowel, it forms the passive verb when suffixed to the active root; thus; ḡ- love thou, ḡ- be thou loved. In this use the ḡ is sometimes replaced and sometimes preceded by ḡ

The ج of the Arabic definite article remains unchanged in pronunciation when preceding an initial ج. But exceptionally the word الجنى suppresses the ج of the article in writing, and reduplicates the radical ج in pronunciation.

In the Arabic definite article ال, the ل is deemed the essential part of the word, which, in consequence, is always mentioned as the ل of definition, (لام التعريف)

1. J 16. adv. 1. Verily. 2. By, for, for the sake of.
